NURTURING THE FUTURE

SOUTH CAROLINA CELEBRATES NATIONAL FARM TO SCHOOL MONTH

STORY BY EVA MOORE

During the week of October 21–25, students across South Carolina will be learning where their food comes from by participating in Make Your Plate SC Grown Week.

The activities are part of National Farm to School Month: Every October, schools across the country mark the month with gardening, taste tests, and other hands-on food education.

“A lot of schools will spend time outside — maintaining a garden, planting a garden, getting the kids immersed in what agriculture is — so students can understand where their food comes from,” explains LauraKate Anderson, who coordinates the South Carolina Farm to School Program for the state Department of Agriculture. A partnership with the S.C. Department of Education and others, South Carolina Farm to School fosters direct relationships between farms and schools, promoting local produce, healthy eating, and agriculture education.

Make Your Plate SC Grown Week is an opportunity for schoolchildren to connect specifically with South Carolina agriculture.

In the Charleston area, for example, the Green Heart Project and Charleston County School District’s Nutrition Services are serving sweet potatoes from “The Great Sweet Potato Harvest” throughout the week. During the first week of October, students, staff, and the community harvested over 200 pounds of sweet potatoes from school gardens. Students across the district will learn about sweet potatoes, with hands-on nutrition education and taste tests of South Carolina-grown sweet potatoes in all elementary school cafeterias. The Green Heart Project has helped create school gardens throughout the Lowcountry, giving children opportunities to learn about plants and agriculture while getting their hands dirty.

Other schools will have people costumed as fruits and vegetables to teach the kids about nutrition. And many schools will offer taste tests and in-the-cafeteria education.

“The cafeteria is a huge component of Make Your Plate SC Grown Week,” Anderson says. “Schools will highlight different produce each day — whatever they’re growing in their garden, they will find ways to implement in their cafeteria.”

South Carolina Farm to School resources are aimed at schools of all kinds, and the resources it offers are free.

“It’s definitely not limited to schools who have financial resources to implement the program,” Anderson says. “If you have dirt, some seeds and can build a box, you can build a Farm to School program and can work with your local cafeteria staff to request those local items.”

CELEBRATING 150 YEARS OF THE STATE FAIR

The South Carolina State Fair is winding down for the year — and what a year it’s been. This is the fair’s 150th anniversary, and they celebrated in grand style.

Running with the theme “Prize Winning Memories,” the fair hosted a free “Circus at the Fair” event with motorcycle stunts, rescue dog performances, and acrobatic stunts, not to mention boosting the fair’s entertainment options and much more. I’m sure a lot of new prize winning memories were made for young and old at the fair this year.

But the fair means a lot more to me than entertainment, as the South Carolina State Fair has always been closely linked with agriculture. There have been agricultural fairs in South Carolina since at least the 1720s, and the South Carolina State Fair as we know it has been running since 1869, moving to its current location near Williams-Brice Stadium in 1904.

For many South Carolinians, especially city-dwellers, the fair is one chance they have to get up close with agriculture, whether it’s watching livestock judging in the Nutt

Cattle Arena or viewing prize-winning vegetables in the Ellison Building. Nearly 500,000 people visit the fair each year, so it’s a key opportunity for us to educate the public about the importance of farmers. The Fair also provides plenty of opportunities for farmers to share their stories with the public.

A few years back — well more than just a few — I was in the arena for the cattle judging contest with my dairy heifers. There was a lot of camaraderie with other kids in 4-H from across the state. And also getting out of school was fun.

For the SCDA booth at this year’s fair, we created an exhibit charting the history of the South Carolina Department of Agriculture, which was founded just 10 years after the state fair was started, in 1879 to oversee everything from geology to sheep husbandry. We’ve had some changes in scope over the years, but our mission of serving farmers has remained the same.

It’s fun to talk about the long legacy of SCDA and the Fair, but it wouldn’t mean a thing if we weren’t always committed to serving South Carolina agriculture. Thanks for putting your faith in us.

CLEMSON DEBUTS ROBOTIC MILKING SYSTEM

BY JONATHAN VEIT, CLEMSON UNIVERSITY

CLEMSON — Dairymen are a hardy lot known for tending their herds through the worst weather and toughest conditions.

But even the hardest dairyman can be forgiven for breaking out his handkerchief and dabbing the sweat from his brow during the unveiling of the new robotic milking system Oct. 3 at Clemson University’s LaMaster Dairy Farm.

The dairy farmers gathered with legislators, Clemson administrators, animal scientists and Clemson Cooperative Extension agents during the early fall heatwave that brought 97-degree temperatures to the Upstate.

The cows were in the comfort of their freestall barn where they were being fanned, spritzed, fed and gently milked in the only university robotic milking facility in the Southeast, and looked upon the proceedings as if to say, “What’s wrong with y’all?”

“We started [designing the dairy] about five years ago, and it was designed for total cow comfort,” said Steve Waggoner, Clemson University dairy farm manager. “It milks the cows individually and you can get individual information on each cow. The robotics run 24/7. It will milk a cow now, two hours from now or 10 hours from now without having to use manual labor in shifts.”

The DeLaval VMS V300 fully robotic milking system is a guided milking system that allows each cow to be milked according to her individual needs and capacity. The cows are averaging about three milking visits per day over the entire herd. Fresher cows that have calved more recently are visiting the milking stall up to six times per day.

“The cows can come and go without people moving them manually and causing them more stress,” Waggoner said.

The cows wear activity monitors that track daily movement and will alert dairy managers when activity is high for improved reproduction and when activity is low to identify possibly sick or lame cows. The activity monitors are a sort of bovine FitBit.

“It tells you when a cow is off in milk production so you can flag her to see if she’s getting sick. So the technology helps us take care of problems with the cows quicker and faster and maybe diagnose and treat the animals before they really have a lot of problems,” Waggoner said.

The cutting-edge dairy also has systems designed to lower environmental impact.

John Andrae, assistant director of Clemson’s research farms, told the crowd that the new LaMaster Dairy has an automated system that washes and recycles the sand that’s used for bedding.

“Over the past year we’ve only had four truckloads of sand delivered. In the previous dairy, we would have had 48 truckloads delivered in a year,” Andrae said.

Watson Dorn, owner of Hickory Hill Milk in Edgefield, said Clemson’s robotic dairy will allow dairymen throughout the Southeast to see for themselves how technology can benefit their operations.

“The dairy industry is heading in this direction. In fact, my dairy is in the process of changing over to a robotic system,” Dorn said.

The technological advancements in dairy production come at a time when the dairy industry is suffering from low profitability caused by a number of factors, including high labor costs. Dorn said more than 1,600 dairies have gone out of business so far in 2019 and he predicts that number will likely reach 2,000 by January 2020. That comes after the U.S. Department of Agriculture reported that licensed dairy farm numbers in the country declined by 2,731 farms in 2018, a drop of 6.8 percent.
